The Impact of Early Relational Trauma : Infant Mental health Interventions for Infants at Risk

*Professor Louise Newman AM
Royal Women's Hospital, University of Melbourne*

Infants are dependent on the quality of emotional interaction and regulation provided by parents and carers for healthy psychosocial and neurological development. Pre-programmed for social connection and seeking of relationships the infant is highly sensitive to emotional communications and the availability of a containing relationship is essential for the unfolding of developmental processes.

Parents with a range of risk factors for early relationship and interactional difficulties may be highly traumatising for the infant and inadvertently establish patterns of anxiety producing, inconsistent and confusing interactions associated with attachment disorganisation. Vulnerable parents include those with histories of unresolved early attachment related trauma in their own lives, those with ongoing relationship difficulties and a range of mental health issues such as depression, anxiety and complex posttraumatic stress disorder.

Infant mental health clinicians have a central role in identification and responding to early signs of trauma in infancy and intervening to improve relationship quality and the parent's capacity to understand the emotional needs and experience of the infant. Interventions include approached to improving the parent's capacity to read and process infant social communication, as well a work with parents to improve reflective capacity and infant understanding. The BEAR model (Building Early Attachment and Resilience) at the Royal Women's Hospital is a group intervention using these principles for high risk parents and infants. Video examples will be used to describe the programme and approach.
